Not illustrated. 1892 edition. Excerpt: ...a few hours, but a patient has survived nearly five days after taking forty grains, and twenty grains has proved fatal to a woman after a year of suffering. Mode of Extraction from the Stomach.--The salts of antimony are decomposed by all vegetable substances containing tannin, and in strong solutions they coagulate milk. The stomach contents should be diluted with water, filtered and acidulated with tartaric acid, and then sulphuretted hydrogen gas should be transmitted through the liquid, in which case the orange sulphide will be precipitated. The colour of the precipitate may be rendered more or less brown from admixture with organic matters. Should this method fail, Reinsch's or Marsh's test may be employed (see Arsenic, pp. 111, 112). If the quantity found in the stomach contents exceeds the ordinary medicinal dose, there is a strong presumption of poisoning, but if the amount is small, it is impossible to say that it has been administered criminally, until proof is forthcoming that it has not been given as a medicine. Antimony is absorbed and may be discovered in the secretions, the blood, and solid viscera. The same method of detection may be employed as in the case of arsenic. The urine should always be examined for antimony. The elimination of the poison by the kidneys is very rapid. When the quantity present is very small, it has been recommended to suspend in a weak acid solution, a coil of pure gold foil, wound round a piece of platinum foil, when metallic antimony will be deposited upon the platinum. This deposit may be treated as follows;--MERCURY. 115 1. Wash and digest in strong nitric acid, until the deposit is dissolved, and then evaporate to dryness. Dissolve the residue in hydrochloric acid and add to the solution...
