The first and most important consideration pertains to the treatment of cases in which there are gallstones in the gall bladder and ducts, which call for removal by incision, and it is found impracticable to attach the sac of the gall bladder to the skin or the intestines, is to suture the wall of the duct. In these cases, it has been proposed to tampon the intervening space to the external opening with gauze, and leaving the ends of the scrips protruding, drainage is accomplished, and the bile or other discharge is kept from entering the peritoneal cavity. While fresh bile is not found to be an irritant to the peritoneum, the vitiated discharge which takes place after obstruction proves hurtful, and should not be allowed to enter the abdominal cavity. Dr. W. E. B. Davis has taken a prominent part in urging this mode of procedure, and has made numerous experiments upon infirm animals, illustrating the advantage of introducing iodoform gauze into the wound for the purpose of walling off the intestines and other viscera, while it serves, by capillary attraction, to carry off the discharge. This has been practiced by others with the best results; and to Dr. Davis is due the credit of impressing upon the profession the advantages of this treatment in cases not admitting of the attachment of the gall bladder to the external opening or the intestines, and in which it is found impracticable to evenly suture an incision of the common duct after the removal of biliary calculi. Attention may also be drawn to the applicability of this process to cases of rupture of the gall bladder, either by traumatism, or as a result of d...
