

LA at Intermission: A City Mingling Towards Identity

LA lacks informed dissent. Using tactics he cultivated for 12 years as a Councilman, Eric Garcetti, the towns top political hybrid, has stepped into this political void, not to fill it, but to maintain its vacuousness, choosing loyalty ahead of brilliance. The result is that city now thinks small, not as though it were participating in a great cycle of drama, but merely loitering in the lobby at intermission. In this series of essays spanning three years, LA is found to be a city that belongs to hipsters and dreamers and futurists and chatterers; it is a city that lacks gravitas, that yaks it up, snapping selfies, dreaming much and doing little, mostly satisfied enough with itself to be willingly distracted from the grand cycle, which was already far from riveting.
